Special Interests in the topics of the URCforSR

Societal change driven by climate-related impact factors not only affects the governance of local challenges, but intensifies the struggle of talking about a common welfare in a continental and world-wide perspective. Therefore, term and concept of 'social justice' need to be reconsidered in an integrative manner including premises of civic societal actors (as religious and other, ethic-related groups) as well as the technical expertise of ecology, economics, political sciences and practical politics.

What you are searching for regarding the cooperation within the URCforSR

I'm looking forward to find interlocutors from a multidisciplinary field of natural sciences, economics and humanities to evaluate and discuss possible tensions of analytical and normative approaches to the handling of societal changes in the face of climate and – therefore as well – societal changes.
